Greetings From The Michelli Experience!

We live in a time of unprecedented customer voice and choice. In the old days customers would threaten a business with "you'll hear from my attorney," and now the rallying cry is wait until "I post about this on my blog." Despite all the chatter about the ease of airing your complaints in the digital age, surveys continue to show declining customer satisfaction levels.

In many ways the plight of customer service globally is consistent with the old observation, "a lot of people are talking about the weather but few are doing anything about it." Fortunately, when it comes to service every one of us can do something to improve it in our personal and professional lives.

From years of observing, consulting with and observing outstanding service professionals and organizations I have come to appreciate that consistent and authentic execution of a few simple behaviors can make the difference between, "I can't wait to write a scathing review on Yelp" and "WOW I have to share this amazing story on Facebook." So let's focus on three behaviors as offered in my book The New Gold Standard - 5 Leadership Principles for Creating A Legendary Customer Experience Courtesy of The Ritz-Carlton Hotel Company.

They are referred to as the three steps to service:

- 1) Offer a warm and sincere greeting (if possible use the customers name)
- 2) Anticipate and fulfill each customer's need
- 3) Give a fond farewell and if possible again use the customer's name

Overly simple? Try it and let me know if consistent execution on these behaviors makes a difference at work and at home!

BULLETIN, BULLETIN, BULLETIN!
